“The Racial State: Race and Workplace Rights in Canada, 1935-1960.” Article Manuscript. Draft completed. “The Racial State” compares two parallel fights for workplace equity in Canada: one involving French Canadians who sought to reverse decades of discrimination in the federal service and one involving Black and Jewish Canadians who pushed for a federal fair employment law in the immediate postwar era. It demonstrates the relative isolation of these two movements for economic justice and argues that French Canadians chose a narrow conception of rights based upon a vision of their distinct heritage and history in Canada while Black and Jewish Canadians developed a universal, colorblind model of rights that nonetheless ignored questions of bilingualism.

“Making Money: Race, Gender and Work in the United States Bureau of Engraving and Printing.” Book Manuscript in progress. The first historical monograph to examine the agency charged with printing the nation’s money and postage stamps, this manuscript chronicles the experiences and struggles of women and African Americans from the organization of the agency in 1862 until the early 21st century. It investigates how racial structures and identities interacted with those of gender and class, focusing specifically on the creation of labor hierarchies that frequently fortified and expressed gender and racial differences. The work aims to broaden our understanding of the: creation of occupational segmentation based upon race and gender and subsequent emergence of fair employment policies; formation of racial and gender identities at the workplace; relationship between unionization and class, race and gender equality/inequality; establishment of corporate cultures (and their ties to race and gender); and interplay of race, gender, class and technological change. Throughout, the study explains how the bureau’s history connected to broader, national histories of both discrimination and labor and civil rights activism.

“The New Deal and National Identity: Race and Ethnicity in the Civilian Conservation Corps.” Article in progress. This study will use research on several CCC camps in Minnesota, Arizona and New Mexico to compare how the ethnic and racial identity of European Americans, African Americans, Mexican Americans and Native Americans may have changed over time as a consequence of the CCC experience. In particular it will investigate the extent to which groups of men began to assimilate into or create a conception of a national or American identity oriented toward the national government.
